SONG

IT was Alice's first date in ever so long. "A whole week," she sighed, whooshing around in the revolving door that led to the ice-creameries. She didn't feel like a girl on a Saturday-night date. She felt terrible!

Right behind Alice, ready to buy her the Super Jumbo Banana Split or even the Double Super, came Ted. Like everyone else in town, he knew that Alice and Paul had been a twosome for a long time, but he wasn't asking any questions. "I guess they split up," was his explanation.

It was true. Alice and Paul had split up, over the silliest argument. For almost a week, Alice had waited for Paul to call her, had day-dreamed of their reunion, his apologies, her apologies, and their happiness at being together again.

But Paul hadn't called. Alice felt blue and sort of lonesome with Ted, and to make matters worse, he had suggested that they stop at the ice-creamerie after the movies. Why, that was where she and Paul always went! That was where they had first been introduced to each other. It was funny, somehow, being there without him.

Suddenly, she realized that Ted had been saying something to her.

"I'm sorry," Alice smiled, "I didn't hear you, Ted."

"I'm going to drop a nickel in the juke box," Ted repeated. "I want to get a load of that sweet, sweet ballad, 'Together Again.'"

Alice could feel her heart sinking. "Not that song!" she said. Then, realizing she was attracting attention, she lowered her voice. "Oh, please, Ted, pick something else," she pleaded. "That one's so . . . so old! And it's corny, too! I wish you wouldn't play it!"

"Why, it's a swell number!" Ted said. "Maybe you just have to learn to like it. Listen!"

He slid the nickel into the slot, pushed the lever and pressed a small numbered button. The juke box lit up and the ice-creamerie was suddenly filled with the romantic melody of love. Alice tried to pretend that she was somewhere else, somewhere far away, but the music wouldn't let her.

"It's a beautiful song!" Ted repeated, humming the refrain loudly. "I'll bet it climbs right to the top of the Hit Par . . . oh, hello!"

The last two words were said in quite another voice to quite another person. Alice, her heart pounding, looked up to see Paul standing at the table. Paul! And he had that very special look in his eyes . . . that "between-you-and-me" look!

"Hiya!" she said, trying desperately to sound as if she didn't care.

"Gosh, Alice," Paul's voice was breathless, "I thought you really didn't care, but I knew different the minute I heard you play our song. Our theme song! Gosh, it was the same thing as telling me you wanted me to come back. So here I am!"

"Paul!" This time, Alice's voice was no longer casual. She was very happy, and she didn't care who knew it!

Paul looked at Alice and Alice looked back at him. They were lost in each other's eyes. "Together Again," they both said, at exactly the same moment.

Ted groaned as he rose and walked quietly away. It was his nickel that had cost him his girl!

ONE of the GANG

"SMALL-TOWN KIDS! Dumb kids! What do they know?" Millie asked herself, throwing a scornful look at the gang of teensters who came sailing past her on their bikes. "They're just babies!"

The boys and girls who were having so much fun were easily as old as Millie, all about fifteen or sixteen years old. But then, they had not lived all of their lives in a big city. The girls did not wear high heels and bright print dresses and a lot of lipstick, as Millie did. Their hair was fly-away and brief, different from her carefully-set coiffure. In fact, they were all different in this dumb one-horse town!

Millie hated the small town. She knew her father had gotten a good job there and the family had to live there, but that didn't mean she had to like it! Her face was dark with dissatisfaction as she stormed into the house.

"Is there anything wrong, dear?" her mother asked. That was a funny thing. Mom seemed to like it here. She kept talking about growing roses and joining the garden club. She said the neighbors were friendly. Friendly! Huh!

"No, mom," Millie answered sullenly. "What's the use of complaining, anyhow? It won't do any good!" She put the groceries on the kitchen table and stood there a moment, lost and aimless.

"I think I'll go for another walk," she said. Her mother's eyes followed her, deep with love and understanding. But Millie had no way of knowing this as her high-heeled shoes took her toward the Town Hall. There was something going on there. Something in which she had no part.

By craning her neck, Millie could see inside one of the windows. Why, it was a dance . . . a square dance! Every girl and boy in town seemed to be there, laughing and having a wonderful time. Millie's eyes filled with tears. "Except me," she said.

Then she brushed the tears aside. "What's the difference?" she said. "So they don't like me! So I don't like them!" She was angry as she turned away from the sounds of music and merry-making. "I'm going home!"

Millie had meant to fling herself into bed, but she found that she couldn't. There was a large box on her bed, one that she hadn't seen before. Opening it, she drew out from between sheets of tissue paper, a pale pink sweater and bobby socks to match. There was a pair of blue jeans under the sweater. And, all the way at the bottom, in an envelope with a little note, was a pink satin hair ribbon. The note said, "Wear these and change your luck. Love, mother."

Somehow, Millie felt different when she saw herself in the jeans and the fluffy sweater. Her high-heeled shoes were all wrong. The old mocassins were perfect! They had a spring to them, as she walked toward the Town Hall. She felt like . . . well . . . like one of the gang!

The girls and boys knew it the minute they saw her. "C'mon and learn to square dance!" they shouted, drawing her into a set. Millie's feet were tapping a different tune now, a happy one. And so was her heart. Why, a small town was fun! It was . . . wonderful!

"Guess I'll have a talk with mom tonight," she thought joyfully. "I think we're all going to like it here!"

OKAY! START PLAYIN' CHAUFFEUR AN' I'LL HANDLE THE CHICK!

-- HEAD FOR THE SMOOCHIN' GROUNDS, JAMES!

The WAY to his HEART

"I DON'T care who it is as long as it's a he!" Prue declared. Quickly, she dialed a phone number, overcoming a feeling of distaste as she heard the squeaky voice at the other end. "Tubby?" she said. "This is Prue. Listen. I'm cooking an elegant dinner and I thought you'd like to come over tonight and help me eat it. You will? Fine!"

Now, Prue didn't think it was fine at all, but what could she do? She had no date for the school dance, although she had waited up until the very last minute and never stopped hoping.

"But the dance is tomorrow!" she wailed, "and if I don't have an escort, I'll be miserable!"

It was then that she thought of Tubby Sanders, who was called Tubby because of his general size and tendency to prize food above all else. She had heard her mother say, "The way to a man's heart is through his stomach," and that gave her this last-minute inspiration.

Tubby Sanders rang the doorbell at exactly six o'clock. Late for school he might be, but never late for dinner! He found the dining room by instinct and his eyes widened at the array of dishes set out on the table.

"You mean you cooked this stuff all by yourself?" he asked.

"Mmm-hmm." Indeed Prue had. She had used every spice in the spice cabinet, made the sauces as rich as possible, and piled whipped cream on custard and meringue on top of that!

Tubby ate as he had never eaten before. There was no one to suggest that perhaps he had had enough. And so, Tubby ate and ate and ate . . . until his eyes were glazed and his voice seemed to be coming from far away.

Prue decided that the time for action had come. "Tubby," she murmured, offering him a third helping of dessert, "have you asked anyone to the dance yet? The school dance, tomorrow?" She flirted her eyelashes at the stupefied Tubby.

It worked! Before huffing and puffing his way home, Tubby told Prue he would call for her at eight sharp the following night. Prue had won her all-important escort!

"It was worth washing all those dishes. And the pots!" Prue reflected the following day, as she primped for the dance. "It will even be worth going with Tubby Sanders!" Prue brushed her hair, giving it fifty strokes. She felt very much the woman of the world, having tried strategy on an unsuspecting male . . . with success!

As Prue debated whether her mother would notice a touch of mascara on her lashes, she heard the phone ring in the hall below. A few minutes later, her mother came up the stairs and entered Prue's room.

"That was Tubby Sanders," Prue's mother said.

"I guess he wanted to know what kind of flowers to bring, huh?"

"No, dear." Mother's voice was quietly sympathetic. "He's got an upset stomach and can't go out at all tonight. He thinks it was something he ate!"

Prue blushed. Strategy! Woman of the world! Well, maybe she didn't have an escort to the dance, but she'd learned one thing. As she removed her party dress, she said hesitatingly, "Mother, there's something I'd like to have for my birthday, if you don't mind."

"What is it, dear?" mother asked.

"A good cook book!" Prue confessed.
